The life of a print job from start to finish.

How does an idea become a reality on paper? Most jobs come to us in one of two different formats, either a digital file or jotted down on paper which then needs to be designed. The first thing we do is determine how the job will be produced (digitally or printed). Then the job is put in pre-press where our graphic designers can either design a new layout or review your supplied artwork and make any necessary changes. Next the customer will be asked to review a proof to make any final corrections and give the final "OK" to print. Once approved, the next step is preflight. Preflight is where we check for things like image resolution, missing fonts and/or images or any other conflicts before sending the file onto the next step of plating or digital printing. We then create a postscript file which is sent to a digital plate maker, gone are the days of costly film. With computer to plate technology you save time and money. Next, the plates are sent to the pressroom where the job is then printed. Both completed digital jobs and printed jobs are then finished up in bindery. Bindery handles cutting, folding, collating, stapling, binding, numbering, perforating, scoring, or any other process needed to complete the job. Finally, the completed job is either picked up or delivered. This entire process takes, on average, about four to five business days.
